Statistics is the compilation, presentation and analysis of many related items of data, which as individual items are unreliable or insignificant. The word originally meant 'state arithmetic', as the first statistics were compiled for census or tax purposes. It now means (a) an assembly of related facts or (b) the mathematical technique of drawing probable conclusions from them. Thus a compilation of totals of smokers and non-smokers, showing the numbers of each who died from lung cancer over a certain period of time, is statistics in the first sense. The deduction from the figures that lung cancer is significantly correlated with smoking requires statistics in the second sense

Statistical data can be presented in tabular form, or in many forms of graphic display. Thus this table shows the percentage of the major elements in the earth's crust:

Element	%
Oxygen	46
Silicon	27
Aluminium	8
Iron	5
Calcium	4
Sodium	3
Others	7
Total	100

A graphical presentation – a 'pie chart' in this case – can give the data much more effectively

Histograms and statistical distributions. The diagram shows the scatter of shots from a gun aimed at a distant target. The shots are divided into specific error-bands, and the height of each block in the histogram represents the number of shots falling within that band. The tallest block represents the most 'popular' single error-band, the mode of the distribution. The median of the distribution is the value which divides the shots evenly into two, half falling nearer than the median value, and half falling further away. Similarly, the median and the upper and lower quartiles divide the shots into four equal groups. The conventional average or mean, obtained by adding all the errors and dividing by the total number of shots, need not coincide with either mode or median. Here it is greater than either, being heavily influenced by the long 'tail' of very wide shots. Divided into sufficiently narrow blocks, the histogram would shade into the limiting distribution curve shown, which could be mathematically analysed

Correlation. The diagram shows the (hypothetical) sales of eggs and of bacon over a year. It is clear that they tend to fluctuate together, ie are correlated to some degree, though the results for any one month (eg May) would not reveal it very convincingly. A statistical analysis would show the degree of correlation, as well as a measure of the likelihood that it had happened by chance.

The normal distribution is one of the most fundamental of statistical distributions. The heights of European males, the number of 'heads' in a set of penny-tossings, and the production errors in many processes are all phenomena which are 'normally distributed'.

The mean, median, and mode of the distribution all coincide at its peak, P , and its spread is defined by a single number – the standard deviation σ (sigma). 68% of a normally distributed set of values will be found within 1σ of the mean value. And while the distribution theoretically 'tails' to infinity in both directions, only 0.26% of values are further than 3σ from the mean.

Probability: the educated guess

In a population of 300 people

150 have brown hair

96 have fair hair

54 have black hair

the probability of a person chosen at random having brown hair will be

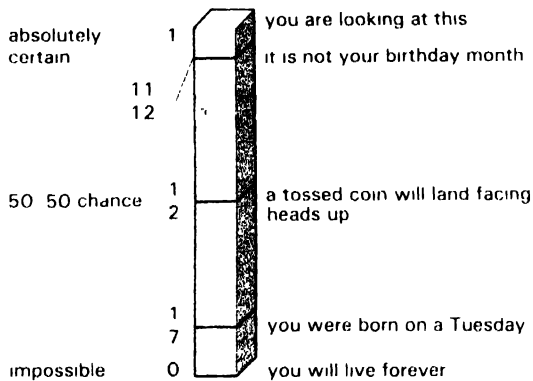

Pr (brown hair) $\frac{\text{no with brown hair}}{\text{total}}$

$$\frac{150}{300} = \frac{1}{2} \text{ ie 1 in 2}$$

the 'probability' is the estimated relative frequency of something happening or being true. All probabilities are greater than or equal to 0 and less than or equal to 1

$$0 \leq P \leq 1$$

Probabilities can be presented on a scale

There are two laws of probability.

The multiplication law – for events which are completely independent. If a coin is tossed, and at the same moment a die is thrown, the probability of obtaining 'heads' and a six is given by

$$\text{Pr (heads, six)} = \frac{1}{2} \times \frac{1}{6} = \frac{1}{12}$$

ie a 1 in 12 chance

The addition law – for different outcomes of the same event.

If a coin is tossed and a die thrown what is the probability of getting heads + six OR tails + five?

$$\text{Pr (heads, six)} = \frac{1}{12}$$

$$\text{Pr (tails, five)} = \frac{1}{12}$$

$$\text{Pr (heads, six; or tails, five)}$$

$$= \frac{1}{12} + \frac{1}{12} = \frac{2}{12} = \frac{1}{6}$$

The laws of probability govern all forms of gambling.

Horse racing has a 'probability language' all of its own. The odds offered by bookies are trading figures, rather than actual probabilities: odds of A/B on mean that A + B are the total chances presented, of which A are favourable (horse wins) but B are unfavourable (horse loses). If these odds represented the true probability then the chances of the horse winning would be $\frac{A}{A+B}$

So odds of 2/1 on implies 2 chances of winning for every 1 of losing. The bookie, offered £2 on such terms, would undertake to return £3 if the horse won. But its real chance of winning must be less than $\frac{1}{3}$, otherwise the bookie could not make any profit.

Similarly, odds of 6/1 against means 6 chances of losing to 1 of winning. The bookie would accept a £1 bet and return £7 if the horse won.

On the racecourse itself the odds and the number of the horse are signalled to the bookies by their tic tac men, using a code of signals that varies in detail depending on the country in which the race is taking place.

Fruit machine theory

Each reel of this slot machine contains 7 different symbols, which means there are 343 ($7 \times 7 \times 7$) possible combinations. Only twelve of these pay back any money, but some of the twelve can be made several ways on the top line. The combination of one cherry plus any two other symbols can be made with either of 2 cherries on the first reel and anything not a cherry on the second and third reel. But a line of 3 sevens, for example, can only be made one way, thus reducing the chances of a large winning.

Conventional trunk cable 10,000 call capacity

The cable on the far left is of the kind currently used to carry trunk calls. The bulky copper wires, and the regular repeater stations required, make the line expensive. It is also vulnerable to interference and water damage.

Optical fibre trunk cable 10,000 call capacity

Each fibre in this slim cable is capable of handling up to 2,000 calls. Calls are coded into digital pulses which pass down the fibre as bursts of light. New very pure fibre material means that the repeaters can be much more widely spaced. Lasers or light-emitting diodes are used to produce the light pulses at a rate of 140 million per second.

Digital sound

Sound takes the form of waves which travel through air, water and some solid objects. When sound is converted into an electrical signal by a microphone, it follows a waveform analogous to the sound. The electrical analogue waves are, by their nature, subject to distortion - for example when passing through the wires in a telephone system. This distortion can largely be avoided by digital transmission.

This representation of an analogue signal shows the varying height (amplitude) of the waveform.

A digital encoder "samples" the amplitude and assigns a numerical value for each height.

Telephone/Viewphone

The telephone can be used not only for transmitting speech but also for communicating computer data and visual images. Computers can 'talk' to each other in this way. When optical fibres are introduced, the viewphone could also become practicable because of the wide signal bandwidth they offer.

Teletex/Telex

Telex is a teleprinter system in which messages typed on the keyboard by the sender are reproduced on the receiver's teleprinter. Teletex is an advanced form of Telex with wider typographic facility – it can also be used to link up word processors in different locations.

Viewdata/data terminal

The Prestel service (British Telecom) enables subscribers to dial a computer and call up pages of information which are displayed on a special television set. Messages can also be written and transmitted.

Facsimile

This piece of equipment scans original documents and transmits the information through to the receiver, where the documents are reproduced.

Each value is then put into code, rather like letters in Morse code, which can be transmitted in pulses.

A digital decoder reconstructs the analogue waveform from the coded message. Even if some values are lost, the original waveform is still retrievable.

The final recreated wave form is in theory identical to the original.

Direct terrestrial transmission

Direct transmission is limited to line of sight — that is, the broadcast cannot pass through solid objects like hills or buildings or go around the curvature of the earth. Also, there is increasing pressure on the available airspace and frequencies for this kind of transmission are becoming limited

Cable or communal aerial

Where direct transmission is impracticable because of intervening objects, waves from the main transmitter are picked up by a local receiver (perhaps on a hilltop, as here) and retransmitted by cable to viewers. Cable can also be used as a subscriber system, in which viewers pay for films or news services.

Satellite

Satellite transmission enables programmes to be distributed over a very wide area. The programmes are sent on a tight beam directly up to the satellite, which then retransmits on a wider beam over a whole continent to receivers serving groups of houses or individual houses.

Colour television

The picture is created by electron beams generated at the back of the tube hitting a screen covered with fluorescent phosphor dots or strips. The beams zigzag across the screen in 625 lines, creating a complete picture 25 times a second. The phosphors are of three types (red, blue, and green) and glow when they are hit by the appropriate electron beam. The shadow mask or aperture grill ensures that the beams only hit phosphors of the right colour. Together, the red, blue, and green points of light give the appearance of a colour picture.

Teletext

In Britain Ceefax (BBC) and Oracle (ITV) Special TV sets receive and display 'pages' of information transmitted at the same time as ordinary broadcasts. These services are free.

Videodisc player

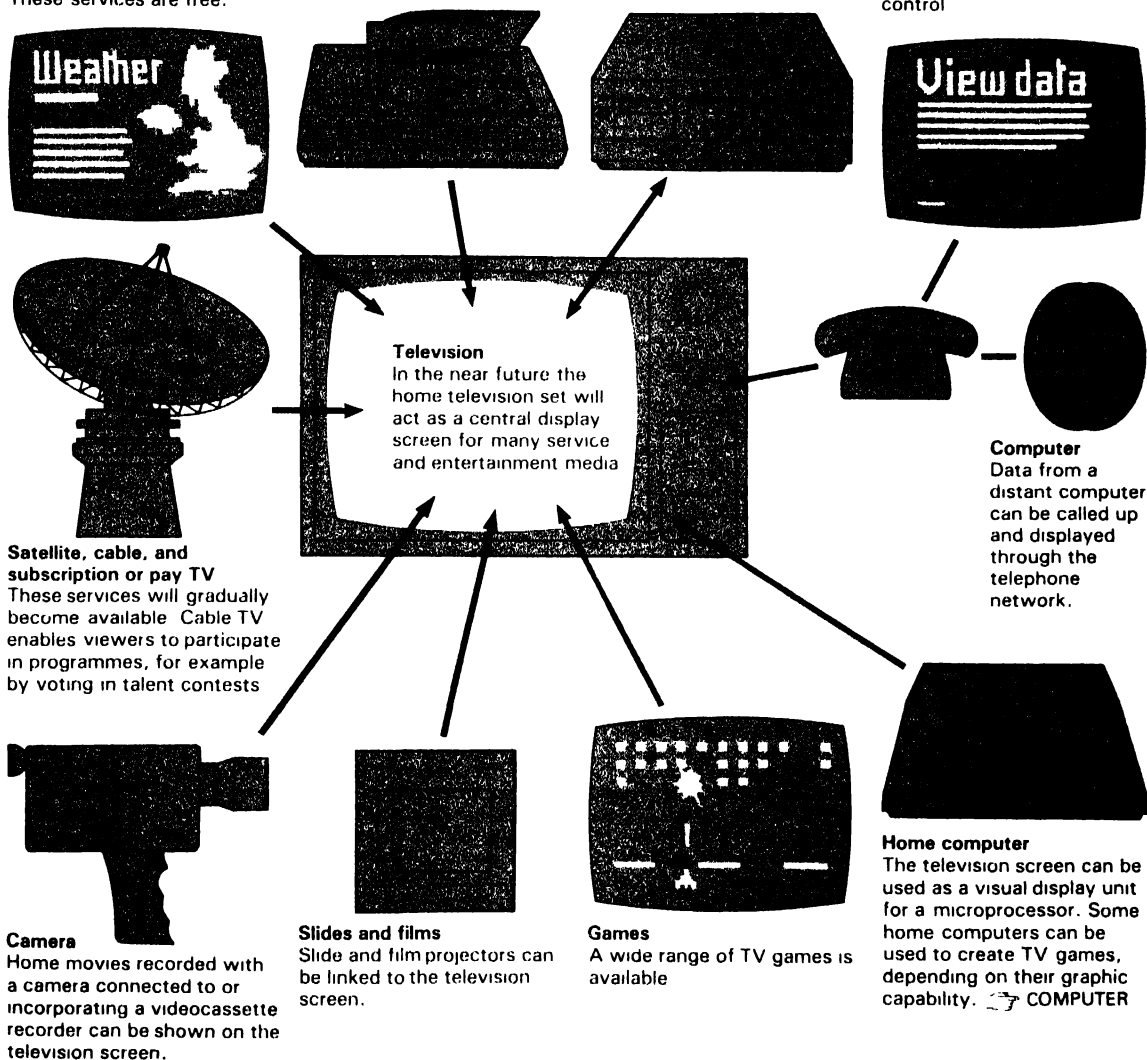

Prerecorded films and programmes on disc are 'read' by the player and displayed on the TV screen. Picture quality of discs is high but it is not possible to record on them in the home. When linked with a home computer there is great potential for educational purposes.

Videocassette recorder

Television programmes can be recorded and replayed. Commercially recorded films, magazines, and educational programmes are available.

Viewdata

In Britain Prestel (British Telecom) This is a subscriber system available by telephone. 'Pages' of information can be dialled using a push-button control.

Display screen/ picture on picture

Developments in TV technology may eventually result in much larger screens. A split screen display enables the viewer to monitor other channels.

Remote control
A remote control set not only enables the user to change channels but is essential for dialling Teletext pages.

Videotape

In a domestic videocassette recorder the helical scanning system is used to lay down video tracks on the tape. Tape is passed around the rapidly rotating head drum and video heads on the drum lay down sloping tracks.

Video movie camera

At present it is possible to record your own videocassettes using a video camera and a portable battery powered recorder. Soon there will be a miniature videocassette recorder and camera combined in one unit as shown above. The light sensitive chip replaces a TV pick up tube.

Videocassette recorder

Domestic video recorders use the helical scan system of recording shown above. There are three principal formats - Betamax, VHS and V2000. Each of these is incompatible with any other. Video recorders can be used either to record television programmes or to play back commercially prerecorded cassettes (feature films or home education).

Signal detection systems

Grooved capacitance

In this videodisc system the stylus/electrode moves along grooves in a disc of electrically conductive material, picking up the picture and sound information stored there as pits. The disc must be protected by a special sleeve when it is not being played.

Grooveless capacitance

A stylus/electrode moves over the surface of the conductive disc picking up information encoded in the pits of one track and guided by tracking signals between the lines of pits. The disc must be protected by a special sleeve.

Optical

A laser beam is focussed onto pits in the underside of a rapidly spinning disc. The pits are lined by a reflective layer and covered by a plastic coating. Dust and dirt on the disc surface are thus out of focus and have little effect.

Videodisc

Videodiscs are prerecorded and offer better picture quality than videocassettes. They have a particularly high potential as an educational medium since information can quickly be found. Some machines are able to advance a sequence frame by frame for analysis, and it will be possible to link some videodisc players to home computers.

Weather monitoring and forecasting by satellite

A geostationary meteorological satellite orbits the earth at a height of 36,000 kilometres over the equator and remains more or less fixed in location relative to the earth. This enables it to relay data constantly over the same part of the world.

High energy particles from the sun may affect communications. The satellite monitors solar emissions and passes the data back to earth.

A depression, also known as a cyclone, is an area of low atmospheric pressure. Clouds form to give rainfall as warm tropical air meets and rises over cold polar air. In the northern hemisphere winds in a cyclone circulate in an anticlockwise direction — in the southern hemisphere they go clockwise.

Foreign Phrases

Pronunciation of Foreign Phrases

All foreign phrases are given an anglicized pronunciation which the English speaker will easily be able to say. In addition, the International Phonetic Alphabet symbols are given where appropriate to help those people who are interested in the way the word or phrase is pronounced in its own language.

Pronunciation of Latin phrases is very variable. We have tried as far as possible to use the modern system of Latin pronunciation, with the exception that for reasons of economy all written vs are shown only as /v/, although the pronunciation /w/ is equally acceptable.
